El Quejigal is a unique property in a secluded valley in the heart of the Sierra de Aracena y Picos de Aroche, a UNESCO World Heritage site. Originally constructed as a secadero – to dry chestnuts for winter fodder for the Pata Negra pigs of the Sierra, the adobe building is situated at the end of a valley that has been irrigated by old water canals dating back to when this sierra was part of Al Andalus. The property has 190 m2 of living space. It is a long narrow building and the rooms are quite small. The building was originally used for smoke drying chestnuts. The centre hall is open as the owners took the floor out to give it more space. The kitchen/dining area is open plan. The large kitchen has a pizza oven and sink opposite the window facing the gardens, sitting room, bedroom and bathroom. The staircase splits into two to the first floor where there are two bedrooms and study. The two hectare property has a stream running through it which has allowed the two gardens to produce wonderful fruits (apples, pears, apricots etc). There are also 60 chestnut trees on a slope opposite on the other side of the valley, as well as Quejigal trees (Quercus...
